It is often commented that spell checkers do not identify all the mistakes in a given text. To be more specific, they do not recognise misspellings that form other valid words.

So, how can this problem be solved? By proofreading, of course!

Re-read your text for words that are not in keeping with your original meanings and make sure not to lose focus while you do it. Proofreading is sometimes more important than using the spell checker.

Practically any written piece, from emails to blog posts, should be proofread. Check through your homework as well, since you do not want to irritate the principal of your school.

It can be said that misspelled words are a sign of ignorance.

The simple act of proofreading will have a great effect on the quality of your work - I am sure that you will receive more compliments from people regarding your written pieces.

There you go my friend; take this advice seriously. After all, you do not want to appear uninformed in front of the general public!
